Statutory services are NATIONAL services that must be provided by law throughout the UK.	A health centre A hospital	A general practitioner would work in the statutory sector. They are highly trained individuals who examine, diagnose illness and disease, and prescribe and carry out treatment.	If someone has an illness or an injury they will need to use statutory care services to get checked out by a professional who can diagnose and treat the issue.
Private care services are owned or run by private individuals rather than the government.	Privately run nurseries Private hospital such as BUPA.	A dietician is an example of a private care worker. They specialise in foods and nutrition. Mainly working with people who have diabetes, food intolerances and high cholesterol.	If a person chooses to use private care services, there is a likely chance they will receive treatment a lot quicker, than they would, if they used statutory services such as the NHS.
These are not for profit organisations and charities and are sometimes referred to as third-sector organisations.	Age UK Mind	An activities coordinator is an example of a voluntary job role. They volunteer at a local residence and organise social activities for those who live there.	If a care service is not provided by a private or statutory care service, a person may be directed to use a voluntary service.
Informal care is provided by individuals who are not paid to do so.	Friends Family members	Informal carers give up their own time. They are not professionals but can offer emotional and physical support. They could be friends or family members.	A person who uses informal care will know the person they are asking for help from. They will have a trusting relationship and will maybe feel more comfortable talking to this person about their problems.
